The original edition of this book, by James Moffett, was supported by a grant from Carnegie Corporation of New York. The widening circles of indebtedness began among people whom I met where I taught and did research—Phillips Exeter Academy and the Harvard Graduate School of Education—and spread nationally when the first version of this book became widely known and widely used and when I collaborated with the other coauthors of the INTERACTION program, benefiting not only from the expertise of these colleagues but also from the feedback to that joint work.

One of these coauthors, Betty Jane Wagner, joined me at that point to help with succeeding editions. She brought experience in teacher training at the National–Louis University, and both of us have worked in the National Writing Project.

Acknowledging individual indebtedness becomes arbitrary. It could never cover the myriad of teachers, language arts coordinators, reading specialists, students, education professors, and other school or university people from whom we have learned much of what we feel we know. We gained valuable experience during countless workshops, consultations, professional meetings, teacher-supervision sessions, experiments with students, collaborations on school materials, responses to our work, and so on. To all those who see their ideas in what we say, thank you.
